Why Nazir didn't identify as a disruptor until he won the award

"When you gave me the Disruptor for Good Award last year, that's the first time I saw myself as a disruptor. It was not a term I used. But it absolutely encapsulates what I do, which is that I don't like the status quo. I don't like the fact that people keep doing the same thing over and over again, expecting a different outcome. I'm always there offering challenge and offering support and offering ideas and also being an advocate for other people who have ideas. So absolutely 'disruptor' was the strangest [description]... took 59 years to get that label. But it's absolutely the label that I recognise now, but I also recognise 'convener'. I like bringing people together. And I think that's something I will hopefully do more of in the future."

What is next for Nazir?

"I need to use and leverage all the talents and relationships I've built. So I am going international, I'm going global.

But also I'm going very local...I'm very much a believer in being the chancellor at Manchester University. It gives me enormous opportunity to use all the facilities and the services that university have for good in whatever way I think I can. It'll be around gender rights, it'll be around equalities more generally. So I'm going to leverage all the skills and opportunities I've been given and continue to do so.

Next week, I am 60 years old. Right now even I can't believe I'm 60 years old. But I mark it by saying I'm recommitting myself to ensuring that this world is fairer than it's ever been. "
